

Dr Emma-Reetta Koivunen currently works as a research associate in Manchester Metropolitan University in the area of ageing and long-term conditions with Professor Josie Tetley. Previously she has worked in the area of ageing, technology and care, with focus on people with dementia and sight and hearing problems, in University of Leeds. She also has experience of working in regeneration and health consultancy. Emma's background is in social anthropology, she's done her first degrees in University of Helsinki in Finland, on internet use and community life in Shetland Islands, and later her PhD in tourism and the internet in Shetland Islands, in MMU.

In addition to her research on older people learning to use technology, her interest in education and ageing comes from her work as a Finnish teacher for adults in Manchester Finnish School, where she has also volunteered as the Head Teacher.
